Extensive guideline! Its such a great go through. It is definitely basic but surprises in the 50 % of the pdf. It is extremely difficult to leave it before concluding, once you begin to read the book.

The stopcock i is again opened and the leveling bottle lowered to the lowest division on the burette. The stopcock i is then closed and the gas in the burette is measured at atmospheric pressure by holding the leveling bottle in such a position that the surface of the water in the bottle is on line with the water in the burette. About two minutes is allowed for drainage of water down the sides of the burette before the measurement is taken, in order to guard against a small error which would otherwise ensue. After measurement the sample is passed into pipette a several times by raising and lowering the level bottle; this operation removes the carbon dioxide, the solution in a is then brought exactly to the mark on the capillary stem, and after waiting the required time for drainage in the burette the sample is measured. The loss in volume shows the amount of carbon dioxide absorbed by the potassium hydroxide solution. The sample is then passed into the pipette b for the removal of oxygen. The sample is passed back and forth several times between burette and pipette in the same manner as when determining carbon dioxide. The alkaline pyrogallate solution does not, however, remove the oxygen from a gas mixture as rapidly as the potassium hydroxide solution removes carbon dioxide, therefore the sample must be kept in contact with...
